Why Is It Not Worth Buying a Car?

The world is becoming more dynamic with every passing day. New technologies give us the opportunity to communicate with people all over the world. Our planet is becoming smaller; it is not a problem to get to the most remote spots, and traveling has become common for all of us. We spend so little time getting to places with all the modern types of transportation available. It is a typical situation nowadays for each household to have a car or two. No wonder cars have gained such popularity among people; they are fast, comfortable, affordable for most people, you can take your own route, and it does not take rocket science to learn how to drive them. For some people, owning a car can be a sign of a particular social status. For young people, getting a license and driving a car is like a sign of becoming a fully-grown person. However, times have changed and we can see a slightly different attitude toward car ownership.

There are several reasons why people nowadays are in doubt concerning spending their money on cars. First, people tend to use cars inefficiently. Very often, there is only one person in a car, whereas the car can carry four to six people. A large amount of cars in a city leads to heavy traffic and traffic jams, where cars just turn to useless metal boxes to sit in. Second, many people have become more environmentally-friendly. If your city is suitable and safe for cyclists, a bicycle seems a better choice to your office, a supermarket or any other place that is not too far away. In addition, a bicycle is definitely faster than a car during rush hour. Another reason why there is a tendency to find an alternative to buying a car is the 2008 financial crisis. People try to spend money sparingly, and a new car turns out to be more of a luxury than a necessity.

Another thing worth attention is that attitudes toward buying and renting things have changed, having some effect on how people purchase cars. There is a tendency not to buy but rather to rent things nowadays. Just think of some popular services such as Spotify, for example. People used to buy CDs some time ago, then an option to buy music online appeared and people found it more convenient and faster. Eventually, people started paying for subscriptions; they did not own a song, but had an opportunity to listen to it. Additionally, Netflix, a provider of online streaming media, has changed the way people watch movies at home. You do not necessarily have to buy a DVD to watch a movie; just pay a subscription price. Another example of renting as opposed to buying is that it is not necessary to drive your own car through the entire country; just rent one when you arrive at another city. Is not that simpler and easier?

We live in times when people would rather spend money on impressions, not material things. That's why cars are treated as not just a form of transportation, which is a useful thing but is not that high on a list of priorities.
